“Speak to me, friend.
Whisper, I'll listen.
I know, I know,
You've been locked out of sight
All these years—
Like me, my friend.”

- Stephen Sondheim
Sweeney Todd

“Pull up thy heart, suppress thy brackish tears,
Torment thee not, but put away thy fears.
Dead to all joys and living unto woe,
Slain quite by her that ne'er gave wise men blow.
Revive again and live without all dread,
The less afraid, the better thou shalt speed.”

- Queen Elizabeth I
verses for Sir Walter Raleigh

Worry Noise Dirt Heat

Components are often lost for the whole, the emotion for the idea—the worry, the noise, the dirt, the heat which destroy and catalyze the creator. And in their place: “musical theater,” the devoted exhale with embarrassment, mistaking the skin for the skeleton. But it’s not their fault—until Worry Noise Dirt Heat, through its embrace of the absurdity of characters in a world of inherent music and their more-than-true heartbreak, provides evidence to the contrary, evidence of the whole in the component—the emotion, the heat, dirt, noise, and worry.
